Eksperimenta! team conducted an exclusive interview with Sir Ken Robinson, focusing on general education, creativity and contemporary art - how the essence of contemporary art (which is posing questions) could encourage young people to think creatively and ask questions, to prevent the education system from killing creativity...

We discussed questions such as:

- How to create practical synergy between the contemporary art praxis and the general education system, to consciously support the development of young people's creativity?
- How does the art educators in schools relate to social, political and critical projects of contemporary art?
- How do you perceive the congruity between technology and creativity - does technology encourage creativity to arise?
- How to support natural creativity?
